

A facultative mutualist

Received: 24 May 2025

Accepted: 15 August 2026

Published online: 27 August 2026

Pritam Saha ¹

Wait a minute... why do you want to download an unnecessary pdf? Do you have a lot of space in your device? Don't have you any work to do? Complete your due work first! Seriously, let us take a step back and analyze this situation. You clicked a button that says 'Download PDF.' Why? Did you think this was going to magically solve your life's problems? Did you think this document contains the absolute secrets of the universe, or perhaps the exact formula to achieve a perfect flow state? Spoiler alert: it does not. It is just a unfinished resume. It is literally just a piece of digital paper. You absolutely do not need this taking up residence on your hard drive. Think about your current storage situation for a second. You probably already have a default folder named 'Downloads' that is bursting at the seams with unnamed files, four different versions of the exact same installation setup, and a questionable amount of saved social media videos. Do you really need to add another file to that chaotic digital graveyard? It will just sit there indefinitely, gathering virtual dust, taking up precious kilobytes of memory that could be used for something far more important—like setting up yet another digital tool to download more video content. More importantly, let us talk about your daily priorities. You are sitting here, browsing a mock scientific journal portfolio, clicking download buttons just to see what happens. Clicking random download links on the internet is the exact opposite of having a sharp focus. It is pure procrastination disguised as professional curiosity. You should be studying. You should be writing that pending paper, debugging that complex code, or finally analyzing that massive data set you have been actively avoiding for the last three weeks. Instead, you are right here, attempting to selectively hoard a resume. This is a classic psychological distraction technique. Your brain is desperately tricking you into feeling highly productive simply by downloading a file, but we both know the real truth. True productivity requires entering a deep flow state, completely blocking out all the background noise, and tackling the genuinely hard tasks head-on. Every single second you spend managing unnecessary downloads is a second stolen from your actual, meaningful goals. Your time is incredibly valuable, and clicking around random web pages is not how breakthroughs happen. Stop looking for minor digital excuses to delay the inevitable. You know exactly what needs to be done. Close this window, take a deep breath, recalibrate that calm mind, and get back to the work that actually matters!